We've been discussing how different art forms affect people and communities. Consider these communities together, or movies that change how people think about important issues. Some people argue that art creates change by making people aware of problems and motivating them to act. Others believe art simply shows what already exists in society without actually changing anything. Which view do you agree with? Why?

Andrew

I believe art has the power to drive social change. At many times in history, protest songs helped unite people to support important causes, while political cartoons exposed corruption and motivated voters to demand better leadership. Art doesn't just show problems; it gives people emotional reasons to care and practical ways to take action for justice.

Claire

I think art mainly reflects society by showing us what people experience and observe in their daily lives. Artists create paintings, songs, and stories based on their personal experiences and cultural backgrounds. While art can sometimes inspire people to think differently, its primary role is to document and preserve the current state of society for future generations.

While Claire mentions an important point about how artists preserve the state of society for future generations, I personally believe that the role that art and artists play in shaping the society and guiding it is undeniable. For instance, consider Hafez, the great Persian poet of the 15th century, were it not for his poems in which he criticized and exposed the corruption of the city where he lived, Shiraz, his people would not have become motivated to demand changes from their leaders. Another example would be a book named Uncle Tom's Cabin which basically had a substantial role in abolishment of slavery in the United States. These examples clearly demonstrate that art is not just an instrument of documentation, it is actually a motor of change that guides societies.
